So George P. Bush--son of Jeb and the political dynasty's fourth generation standout--is making his Washington, D.C. debut this week. The 37-year-old lawyer is now running for Texas land commissioner, but his family reportedly expects bigger things from the telegenic offspring of the former Florida governor.

Which is as good an excuse as any to revisit a police report detailing George P.'s creepy, stalkerish behavior towards a former girlfriend.

Back when he was a Rice University student, Bush was investigated for burglary and criminal mischief related to a 4 AM visit to the Miami home of his ex, Cristina Cohen, and her parents.

A Miami-Dade Police Department report includes an account of the December 31, 1994 incident provided to cops by Murry Cohen, Cristina's father.

According to Cohen, Bush--wearing black shorts and no shirt--arrived at the residence and "went to his daughter's bedroom window," pulled it open, and "pushed the screen inward." As Bush was "climbing in the window," Murry Cohen awoke and spotted the trespasser. A neighbor of the Cohens also spotted Bush trying to get into the residence and began to argue with him.

With his intrusion thwarted, Bush "backed out of the window." Cohen reported seeing Bush then "jump into a vehicle and flee." But he would not be gone for long.

Bush returned to the home 20 minutes later and drove his car through the Cohens's yard, causing damage to about 80 feet of the lawn.

When police arrived at the residence, the Cohens identified Bush as the perpetrator. Cristina Cohen explained that she used to date Bush, but that they "have been separated for 1-1/2 years." She added that Bush "has been a problem ever since they broke up."

After the Cohens provided police with Bush's home address, an officer went to the residence and "spoke to him and parents." But since Murry Cohen did not want to press charges, Bush "was not arrested on the scene," according to the police report.

When police checked back with Cohen several days later, he told a detective that he was not interested in pursuing charges against Bush, "and that he wanted the matter resolved." Cohen then signed a non-prosecution form.

A month before his son attempted the illegal bedroom incursion, Jeb Bush lost the Florida governor's race to incumbent Democrat Lawton Chiles (Bush won the governorship four years later, in 1998).

George P. Bush's campaign web site describes him as "part of the next generation of Texas leaders...a successful businessman, philanthropist, civic leader and veteran dedicated to advancing conservative values." The married Fort Worth resident and his wife are expecting their first child this summer.
